Distinguished Service Award
Deadline: Annually, February 1st

The Distinguished Service Award is an annual award that is to recognize distinguished service to the University, to a profession, discipline, or to the public, and is intended to recognize service in the same way that other awards recognize distinguished teaching or research. The Distinguished Service Award carries with it a one-time cash award in the amount of $5,000.

Any faculty member or librarian (except those currently in administrative posts above the departmental level) may be nominated. Types of service appropriate for consideration are listed below.

The nomination should clearly describe the nature and extent of the service activities. Supporting evidence, such as evaluative comments by persons who are acquainted with or who have benefited from the service, is helpful.

Nominations may be made directly to the Committee and through departmental chairpersons or deans. Nominations with supporting statements or evidence should be sent to the Committee on Distinguished Service Awards, Office of the Vice Provost for Faculty and Academic Affairs, Bryan Hall Room 111, by February 1st.

Recipients of these awards will be honored at a spring semester reception and will be considered for the W. George Pinnell university-wide award.

The Committee will apply the following criteria approved by the Bloomington Faculty Council (Circular B27-86).

Service to the University:

The award should be given to a person whose service to the University has been demonstrated through consistently exceptional service typically extending over a period of at least five years with evidence that the service has resulted in greater effectiveness, efficiency, and/or visibility in an operation of the University as a result of the individual’s efforts.

No distinction is made between persons who have been appointed to a service role and those who have not. However, the emphasis is on exceptional service in one, and usually more than one, role.

Service to the Profession or Discipline:

The award may be given to a person who has shown exceptional service to a particular profession or discipline. This person must have shown national or international involvement in one or more professional or scholarly organizations in a manner that has created a substantial impact on the ways the organization(s) serves and promotes members’ activities. For example, a candidate may be president of a national association of professionals or scholars, but unless his/her administration made an unusual impact on the affairs of the membership, the service would not be deemed exceptional.
Public Service:

The award may be based on a faculty member’s service on local, state, national, and/or international levels. It should reflect continuing effort and unusual achievement in promoting the objectives of a public service agency or public service principle. For example, a person active in environmental affairs may be involved with several agencies, but the promotion of the principle of maintaining healthy environments would be the focus of the award.

Comprehensive Service:

Frequently the award is given to a person who shows exceptional achievement in a number of areas. Evidence of contributions to the University as well as other areas should be included in the dossier where possible.
